

ETL Project Final Report

Jenni Davis, Susan Farago, David Jimenez, Austin Olea, & Elizabeth Conway

With the growing number of apps available to reserve camping spots in Colorado, enthusiasts need a starting point to narrow their search for adventure. Our database identifies Colorado campground locations by latitude and longitude coordinates, provides the number of camping spaces at each location, and lists the allowable equipment to be used at each site. The database also provides enthusiasts with the opportunity to review historical availability from 2010 - 2020 and reservation lead-time by location.

Extract:

Our primary source of data came from the Recreation Information Database (ridb.recreation.gov). Their database provides users with information associated with recreational activities throughout the US. Ten csv files were downloaded for each respective year (2010 – 2020). Each initial file contained 56 columns of attributes associated with a single reservation booked using Recreation.gov. Additional data from the csv files containing the camping facility's latitude and longitude were downloaded for each respective year (2010 – 2020).

Our second source of data came from National Park Service Visitor User Statistics (irma.nps.gov/STATS). Their databases provide a myriad of csv accessible files on recreational activities occurring within National Parks. Four csv files were downloaded for each National Park located in Colorado containing overnight stay data from 2010 – 2020. Monthly visitation comments from 2010 – 2020 were downloaded as csv files, by National Park, respectively.

Transform:

Recreation Information Database → Historical Reservation Data

The historical reservation data extracted from the Recreation Information Database (RIDB) for 2010 – 2020, respectively, was far too large to be cleaned locally. Our team utilized pandas to load the data into a data frame for cleaning.

The first objective was to rid the files of the columns not relevant to our final database and / or with duplicative information. We first created a new data frame by removing 48 columns not applicable to our database. The remaining table contained the following: OrderNumber, Park, SiteType, FacilityID, FacilityState, StartDate, EndDate, and NumberOfPeople.

Next, we filtered on Colorado within our new data frame using 'FacilityState' / 'CO'. From here we determined that the column 'SiteType' contained unrelated activity bookings. We created a list of desired values and set column 'SiteType' to return only the values present in the list.

We encountered duplicate OrderNumbers in the historical reservation data. Upon further analysis we decided to drop duplicate data in the OrderNumber column which impacted 2,084 records (see image below).

Once completed, our data frames were checked, confirmed, and exported to csv files, respectively. The ten csv files were joined locally into two csv files.

Recreation Information Database → Campground Facilities Geocoordinates

Additional data of interest present in the RIDB reservation data included the facility coordinates. The Python library pandas and reverse-geocode were used to transform and acquire desired information for an additional table to be included in the final database.

To access the lat/lon coordinates of each campground we selected the following columns from the RIDB reservation csv files and created a new dataframe using pandas library: RegionDescription, Park, FacilityID, FacilityState, FacilityLongitude, and FacilityLatitude.

FacilityLatitude.

The RIDB reservation data did not include city or county location associated with the facilities lat/lon coordinates. To allow for queries on campground location proximity within the state we utilized the python library reverse-geocode to append city, state, and county information to the data frame described above. From this data frame we dropped and renamed columns for our final table:

RegionDescription, Park, FacilityID, FacilityState, FacilityLongitude, FacilityLatitude, CityPlace, County.

One null value in Facility ID was detected in the Geocode data. This row of data was removed.

The transforming of the National Park Service Visitor User Statistics / Overnight Stay Data was done locally using Excel. The files were much more manageable each consisting of 133 rows and 40 columns of data.

Column headers were renamed to clarify descriptions (e.g. 'field 1' renamed to 'park'), a 'state' column was added to include 'CO', and an 'ID' to provide a primary key, ~25 static 'sum' columns were deleted. The four csv files were joined into one csv file with the following fields in our dataset: ID, Park, State, Year, Month, Recreation_Visitors, Non_Recreation_Visitors, Concession_Lodging, Tent_Campers, RV_Campers, Backcountry_Campers, Misc_Campers, Total_Overnight_Stays.

The transforming of the National Park Service Visitor User Statistics / Visitor Comments data was also done locally using Excel. Each file contained 20-98 rows and only 2 columns of data.

We added three columns 'ID', 'Park' and 'Year' to provide a primary key to join tables.

Excel was then used to consolidate the four csv files into one file containing the following fields: ID, Park, State, Year, CollectedDate, and Comments.

Load:

The database platform used to load the cleaned csv files was PostgreSQL. We determined that PostgreSQL would be the best database solution as the reservation data tables and the national parks data files had relational characteristics. An ERD (Entity Relationship Diagram) was developed for this database using Quick DBD and was imported into a SQL database called 'colorado_camping_db'. To load the data into this SQL database, we accessed a jupyter notebook where pandas and sqlalchemy were utilized to upload the cleaned data from RIDB reservations and NPS files.

During the load process, troubleshooting issues arose, which caused additional transformation to occur. These issues included incorrect data types in NPS files, differences in National Park nomenclature in the two data sources, and duplicates in RIDB data. For the NPS files, all but one datatype were string objects, even for columns with integer values. To remedy this before loading into our database, a dictionary was created using pandas to reassign desired data types.

Upon further inspection of the proposed tables within our database, connecting RIDB coordinate data on the column 'RegionDescription' with the 'Park' column on NPS data was hindered by the value referral of National Parks being different in both datasets. This was corrected by filtering for the unique values in the columns for each dataset and differences were replaced with the same values per mapping.

Loading the two datasets continued, but upon further queries into the generated SQL database, duplicate values for the RIDB data was found in 'OrderNumber' for years between 2016-2020. This was determined to be a small anomaly of a repeated order number, which we effectively dropped from the dataframe within the jupyter notebook. Per this transformation, we had to drop the 'reservations' table from the database, upload it again into the SQL database, and confirm that duplicates were removed.

We discovered the transform and load process was iterative and required several cycles between transform and load.
